

Ladies and gentlemen, teachers and friends, today I want to talk about something important: changing the way we do school. Right now, we spend five days a week in class, and sometimes even on weekends. But what if we could make it different?

Imagine having a three-day weekend – an extra day off to relax, do what we love, and spend time with family and friends. Doesn't that sound nice?

Our current school schedule can feel like a never-ending cycle, like a hamster on a wheel. But what if we could break that cycle and have a longer weekend? That's 52 more days of free time in a year. Just think of all the things we could do!

Did you know that some countries like Finland, known for great education, have shorter school weeks? They focus on learning more deeply, not just more often. Maybe we should think about doing the same.

School can be tiring, like running a long race without a break. But with a shorter school week, we might feel more rested and ready to learn.

Some people worry that we'd lose learning time, but we can make the most of our time in school with better planning and focus. And who knows, a shorter school week might make us even more excited about learning!

In conclusion, let's think about having school only four days a week. It could give us more time to relax, be with family, and grow as individuals. It's like getting a breath of fresh air on a hot day, a smart change to our school routine, and something that could make a big difference. So, I encourage you all to consider this idea, because it could make our school days better. Thank you!
